Acknowledgments

AS SOLITARY an activity as writing is, no one writes a book alone. After having written this one, I wonder why anyone would want to. From the time I began this project in a very different form as a dissertation, I have benefited from the generosity of a number of friends, mentors, and colleagues. R. W. B. Lewis, Alan Trachtenberg, Jean-Christophe Agnew, and Richard Brodhead not only proved to be model advisors and challenging critics, they also served, long after they had seen the last of my dissertation, as ideal readers.

A faculty fellowship from the Commonwealth Center for the Study of American Culture at the College of William and Mary came at just the right time for me to recast the dissertation into a book. Beyond that year, the center provided me and my colleagues with an intellectual environment perfectly suited to encourage interdisciplinary work. Without the center's support, and that of Director Chandos Brown in particular, this book would not have been possible. Equally important have been the students of William and Mary's American Studies Program, whose energetic engagement with the study of culture has provided me with a valuable resource for thinking through my own ideas. I am also grateful for two summer research grants from the College of William and Mary.

Scott Donaldson, Bruce McConnachie, and Richard John each read portions of the manuscript. Alexandra Michos was an exacting and adroit research assistant. Robert Gross, Christopher Wilson, Joel Pfister, and Chandos Brown each read the entire manuscript; their sympathetic and searching critiques are reflected in the book's strengths. Any weaknesses, of course, are mine.

A part of chapter 2 appeared in The New Orleans Review (Summer 1991); portions of chapter 3 appeared in Rivista di Storia Contemporanea (January 1991). I am grateful to the publishers for permission to use the material here.

I owe my deepest thanks to my wife, Joyce, to whom this book is dedicated, and to my daughters, Elizabeth and Margaret, who continue to remind me of the joy, too often forgotten in the labor, of reading and writing.
